

flow

Stewing in your own anger for too long is like drinking poison.

(Even if the anger you feel is righteous, sitting in it for too long can turn sour.)

Maybe at first you can convince yourself
that you feel normal. That the poison
hasn't taken hold.
That maybe you're immune.

Then the effects start to take hold.

It becomes harder + harder
to drink the antidote
because the poison has taken such deep root
inside you, Corrupting the way you even
see the world around you.

Before you know it, that anger is touching more than just the person you're angry with.

It's leeching into your system,
reaching your heart.

Letting anger fester to the point of poisoning your heart isn't good for anybody.

Least of all you.

Keep the anger from touching the way you see everything by working through it, forgiving, and letting go.

Pour out the poison and you won't get to where you need an antidote.